

A Short Draft for a Longer History of Marist College Theatre

by Gerard A. Cox

Based on oral tradition and anecdotes from a variety of sources, we know that theatre activities were in evidence throughout the first decade and a half of the history of Marist College. One-act and full-length plays by established playwrights and productions of Shakespeare's plays were among the accomplishments of the student body, then a small assemblage of male religious preparing to become educators. (Among the present faculty of the college are several cast members from a 1950s production of HENRY V.) The playbills from these years show that their programs also included student written short and full-length plays such as "The Lame Donkey," a short play based on a Christmas fable and LUX ET TENEBRAE, a full length play portraying the final hours in the life and death of Christ..

According to a 1958 edition of the student newspaper, in response to urgings of the college's newly installed president, Linus R. Foy, a theatre organization for students was formed, creating what is now "the college's oldest student club." By 1959 the group was known as the Theatre Guild. (The designation as "the oldest club" first appears in print in THE RECORD in 1961. In 1960 the college's name had been changed to Marist College.) During the start-up years of this organization it existed side-by-side with a separate set of in-house theatre productions staged by the young religious attending the college and, within their structure, student directors were common from earliest days.

The initial attempt to permit "lay" students to direct Guild productions came in December, 1961, when Richard Kearney, a 21 year old undergraduate, directed a one-act play by Eugene O'Neill as the first student assignment under "The Student Director Program." The program was begun by James Britt, Guild Director, "to foster a finer understanding of the Dramatic Arts," as well as deploying leadership qualities in students. The drive to create alternatives approaches to theatre through new student clubs was partially caused by the desire to have more opportunities to direct.: Children's Theatre (c1968) and Experimental Theatre (c.1970) A later trial program sponsored by the Guild for student directors came in 1974 when a repertory company was formed. The annual festival of student written plays (1981) eventually became a major opportunity for students to gain experience as directors.

The Theatre Guild persisted as the Guild until 1976 when it merged with Children's Theatre (c. 1968) and Experimental Theatre (c. 1970) to become the Marist College Council on Theatre Arts (MCCTA). Children's Theatre had been founded as a separate organization since the Guild did not want to take on extra productions. Also, the student founders of Children's Theatre wanted to direct the plays, themselves. And it was at about the same time that other students expressed a desire "to experiment with new works." There was something of a rebellion abroad against the Guild's commitment to draw its bills exclusively from those plays which had enjoyed, if not commercial, at least critical success on Broadway. Two factors came into play. There was a new openness to staging original works by both students and faculty and there was a renewal of the push to create more chances for students to learn about directing in the theatre.

The college's first children's production was given on March 21-23, 1969. In the beginning, a few performances were given on campus; often more performances were performed "on the road" than on campus. Elementary schools, hospitals, and, even every now and then, prisons were the locations at which the road-shows were given. Funding for these trips came from community agencies. Eventually these external dollars became more difficult to obtain and student academic schedules became more disparate making travel arrangements impossible, even when money was secured. Touring ended and the number of on-campus performances increased to a week, seven performance schedule. Performances have since doubled within the one-week format thereby requiring two casts of characters to avoid having students miss too many classes. Today Children's Theatre is performed annually for several thousand children who come to the campus.

Consistent efforts to encourage student writing for theatre are noted in 1970 under what then were called "experimental productions." Although these early efforts originated as class projects in one professor's theatre course, the Theatre Guild encouraged and financially supported the class efforts. At first the plays were presented both on and off-campus. The most often used off-campus site was the historic Vassar Institute which, at that time, housed the Marist College administered Poughkeepsie College Center. At the same time some independent productions of original works appeared.

Eventually the format for original works began to change, the class projects resulted in programs of multiple works, such as DOUBLE BILL (1978) and TWO FOR THE SHOW (1979). Since 1980 the natural extension of this practice has been an annual festival of short plays written, directed and acted by students.

Today, theatre productions at Marist College are still being funded through student government's allocation of money derived from the student activity fee. The students' drama club, MCCTA, submits a budget request to student government on a semester by semester basis.

The sole structural change within MCCTA since the 1976 unification came with the addition of HuMarists. In the early 90s some undergraduates branched out into the arena of stand-up comedy. At first their performances were high points in students' talent contests. Then, slowly at first, but with persistence, a group of comedians came together and searched for recognition as an organization. The earliest effort was to incorporate with MCCTA which was prepared to sponsor the humorists as an adjunct activity. But student government eventually decided that this group should find its permanent home within the MCCTA organization, as another performance unit. Final constitutional unification came about in 1998.

The traditional approach of relying on the faculty adviser(s) to supply professional guidance was effective through the 1960s and for a short time in the 1970s. It was during the '70s that the involvement of full-time faculty began to disappear, here due to some of the most supportive faculty turning to college administration, while on other campuses it may have been due to faculty withdrawal from involvement with extra-curricula activities. Today's faculty advisor is a voting member of MCCTA's Executive Board. Yet it is quite different from when two or more faculty met with a small group, three or four student officers of the Guild, to make all the administrative decisions for the season.

While dependence upon semester by semester budget allocations from student government worked when fewer productions were staged, planning an entire theatre season became vastly more complicated starting with the late '70s because from one semester to the next, there's no guarantee of the level of allocated funding. Even a semester plan is troublesome today since it is impossible to hire professional directors, choreographers, musicians when there is no time to do a search after budgets are announced or, worse yet, to make adjustments when the money for professional staff is disallowed.

Finally, there is a comment in one of the more popular national college guides that helps to describe the role played by the theatre organization on campus today. "In the cultural arena, the Marist College Council on Theatre Arts is a favorite, producing several plays each year, some of them written by students and now appearing in the new 350-seat Nelly Goletti Theatre located in the $27 million student center."

On October 16, 2001 the Marist College Council for Theatre Arts was presented with the Dutchess County Executive's "Art in Education"

Award. This honor was given in recognition for the activities MCCTA has presented for a variety of audiences through the years. :

History of College Productions

Retrievable records, primarily the college's student newspapers (names of the newspaper over the years: Greystone GAZETTE, The Reynard's RECORD, The Marist College RECORD, THE CIRCLE) and yearbooks (THE GREYSTONE, THE REYNARD), along with memorabilia provided by theatre alumni, have made it possible to compile the list given below of productions staged by the college's staff and students.

Productions by external groups (when recorded) have been noted; these are listed to the right on each page. When an asterisk (*) appears it indicates the play was written by a Marist College student or alumnus.
